The graduated system is a good idea. It lets the drivers have more practice before he/she gets their unrestricted. This system also cuts down on driver distraction. Finally, this law is preventing accidents in the future.

That's the reason the law changing the drivers licence system is a good law.

The learners permits + Intermediate license is good practice for young drivers. It gives them the ~~positive~~ experience they need to be on the road unrestricted. Lots of knowledge is gained by experience.

Drivers need to know how to drive before being released on the open road.

The next reason the graduated system is a smart idea is driver distraction is minimized. Most teen drivers carry quite a few friends. Friends get to talking, and next thing you know the drivers eyes are off the road. With less people in the car there's not as much distraction.

The last reason for agreeing with this law is it can prevent injury into the future. Giving these drivers ~~less~~ this added practice should prevent many injury due to collisions. The graduated system not only saves injury, but maybe even lives. And saving one life is worth not getting your unrestricted license.

In conclusion the law that changed the drivers licence system to the graduated system is a good one. Giving teens practice, experience, and less distraction the number of automotive collisions should be reduced.
